In response to criticism that, despite its "federalized" structure, the federal government has lost the ability to regulate itself, a federal district court has decided that federalism has not been eliminated, but rather, that even the "federal" part has been compromised because, as stated in the Supreme Court case, "the government has not eliminated its authority over all aspects of its regulation." "When the federal government creates an effective regulation of its own behavior, it is a threat to the rights of its own citizens," the court said.
